With the legalization of recreational marijuana in the beginning of this year, Nosrati predicted a demand for dedicated cannabis rooms within his highly sought after spec homes. The prolific developer, popular with celebrities, professional athletes, and Fortune 500 executives quickly added "cannabis lounge" to his already lengthy list of luxe amenities.

Nosrati's plans to build a dedicated cannabis room within his latest mansion recently caught the eye of the founders of HighTimes.com. As the article noted, the mansion's "cannabis conservatory," will provide everything that homeowners need to grow their own organic, high quality medicinal cannabis, as well as create a fully ventilated space for them to enjoy it. The conservatory can be accessed via a secret bookshelf entrance with biometric lock, and also features a full bar, cigar lounge, wine cellar, video wall with multiple screens, golf simulator and more.

With the increasing acknowledgment of cannabis' medicinal benefits, Nosrati has five new, high-end homes in various stages of construction in Bel Air, Brentwood and Beverly Hills. List price is in the $30 - $40 million dollar range.

In addition to creating what he predicts will be the modern day equivalent of a cigar lounge, Nosrati's conservatories come complete with an organic hydroponic cultivation gallery featuring a maximum of six cannabis plants-California's legal limit for homegrown. And, because Nosrati understands that not everyone has the time or the knowledge to grow their own cannabis, each of his upcoming homes will come with expert gardening services to care for the plants.

But what about the rich and famous who don't wish to partake in California's new favorite pastimes? Apparently the cultivation rooms can be repurposed to serve as an indoor, organic garden. The harvester on hand will help plant and grow vegetables to make productive use of the space.
