

A Brentwood home goes next-level with biophilia thanks to its immense moss wall. Nils Timm Visuals

This Brentwood mega-mansion has its own moss wall

Over the past 10-plus years, luxury developer-designer Ramtin “Ray” Nosrati has put up more than 100 luxury homes in LA. His latest, dubbed Allure, was carved into the mountainside, requiring the removal of 680 truckloads of dirt to create a 1.3-acre plot.

The seven-bedroom, nine-bathroom compound has its own putting green and pickleball court, as well as a Michael Jordan-themed basketball court and a movie theater with a Rolls Royce Starlight ceiling embedded with fiber-optic lighting. There’s even a glass window in the swimming pool to offer a view to the 16-person sunken fire pit.

But the house’s most eye-catching elements are the living moss walls suspended 30 feet about the living room.

Extending up to the skylight, the two planes cover approximately 5,000 square feet, according to the listing with Sally Forster Jones at Compass, and include four varieties of moss.

“Designing and building Allure was an opportunity to push the boundaries of luxury and design in Los Angeles,” Nosrati said in a statement. “Every detail is a piece of a larger narrative that speaks to my team’s relentless pursuit of perfection.”